Vaccination is viewed as the key to employees returning to the office and receiving approval to resume business travel. However, a significant percentage of the global population is hesitant and skeptical about receiving vaccines. Travel managers are now facing lingering HR questions that could affect the company’s travel program and ultimately, progress toward recovery.

Some of these questions include:

How are HR departments handling employees who are unsure or unwilling to take the vaccine?
What should travel and HR professionals understand about the human rights and diversity issues informing individual decisions? What can and cannot be required?
What is the current research saying about expected return to the office? Is there any correlation between return to the office and return to travel?

Amber Clayton, SHRM’s Knowledge Center Director, will share her professional insight and research/data updates on the impact and effect of the vaccination process on HR practices. She has extensive experience in the field of human resource management and has held various HR roles for over 20 years before joining SHRM in 2011.
